And the men Olive deems "Canada's Greatest CEOs" came to power from different avenues: Max Ward built his airline from scratch, while Laurent Beaudoin of Bombardier married into a business. What all men have in common, according to Olive, is six leadership strategies that shaped their successes. Each possesses the audacity to pursue "a big idea"; the ability to focus; a willingness to "reinvent the company"; an ability to build a team culture in which authority is delegated and shared; the readiness to think globally; and the strength to embrace adversity. The distinction is that they have seen wealth as a means of perpetuating their enterprises. And, according to the no-guts-no-glory credo, "that's a good thing." Reviewer: Lynne Van Luven.
