The concept of the auteur of the filmmaker as artist and author of his or her works began in Paris, where filmmakers and critics reacted to the industrialization of filmmaking in the United States and Europe. Within the context of cinema, the word auteur is used to describe a director who exerts a high level of control across all aspects of a film. Auteur directors generally have a distinctive style from film-to-film and often fill other roles besides directing including: writing, editing, and sometimes acting in their own films. In the sense that many commercial film productions will include a "dominant personality" influencing the shape and look of a film more than others, the idea of the film auteur or author is not necessarily very controversial. Although claims have been made for the importance of producers, screen-writers, and stars, either in general or in relation to particular films, the director usually with the final say over the detailed realization of scenes (and hence over the way they will look and sound on screen) and often with crucial say over editing and other postproduction processes, and Texts: Bordwell and Thompson, Film Art: An Introduction; Grant, Auteurs and Authorship: A Film Reader; supplementary readings as assigned.
