Bentham sought to create what he termed a "Pannomion" or a codification of the entire body of English laws as they were known at that time. He believed that the one constant in all these laws should be that they were derived from the will of the legislator. these laws were to be made up of a command or prohibition supported by the threat of punishment. Bentham's emphasis on law and punishment reflected the fears he had towards the natural rights ideology that had resulted in the French Revolution. O'Connell's relationship with Jeremy Bentham is the subject of frequent comment. However, the nature of this relationship has never been adequately documented, largely because the principal documentary evidence " their correspondence " remains uncollected. As a result, there exists a lacuna in the literature relating to O'Connell's involvement with British radicalism. This essay reconstructs the nature of his political alliance with Bentham from the evidence provided by their correspondence, from 1828 to 1831.
