As many Latin American Cities began to grow and develop during colonial times, their organization was mandated by a set of laws called the Laws of the Indies. These were a set of laws issued by Spain to regulate the social, political, and economic structure of its colonies outside of Europe. These laws "mandated everything from treatment of the Indigenous people to the width of the streets." In terms of city structure, the Laws of the Indies required that colonial cities have a grid pattern built around a central plaza. Blocks near the plaza were for residential development for the c... The city is relatively easy to navigate and public transportation is accessible. You can find everything from five-star luxury accommodations to friendly hostels. As a solo traveler, Bellavista is a great area to stay around. Buenos Aires has a European vibe with an intoxicating Latin flare. Petty theft is unfortunately common in the city, so just make sure that you don't wear flashy jewelry, don't carry around valuables, and lock up your important belongings (passport, credit cards, jewelry, etc.) in your accommodation's safe. Traveling through Latin America was one of the most memorable trips I have been on. It involved over 15 months of hitchhiking, busing, flying, and walking through 14 countries. Upon arriving back home, the question of my favorite places kept coming up! This question is nearly impossible to answer as a whole so I decided to break it up. With possibly the friendliest people in Latin America, the locals of Medellin have taken it upon themselves to rid the shady past. Tourists are now welcomed and even looked after by millions of locals who want you to see Medellin for what it really is -- a world-class city! This bustling city is now home to amazing culture, food, and nightlife that could challenge any other city in the world. The most beautiful cities in Latin America are those that preserved the smaller dimensions and indelible charm of colonial times. The much bigger metropolises -- especially the ones with over 10 million people, like Rio de Janeiro, Sao Paulo and Mexico City -- don't have that charm and human-sized coziness. This city has the highest skyscraper in all of Latin America; the Gran Torre Santiago, with a 300 meter height, along with much more things. I know there are much more beautiful cities in Latin America, so please post some pics. Ernesto Hernandez.

Montevideo, the capital of Uruguay, once again occupies the top position.
