in the Age of Computer Simulation. When the innovators at Xerox Park in the 1970's (Hiltzig 1999) determined to make computers easy to use they developed the visual interface controlled primarily with a mouse that Apple Computer borrowed for the Lisa and later, with major success in 1984, for the Macintosh, and that Microsoft then borrowed for the ubiquitous Windows interface. Even the Linux flavor of Unix provides mouse controlled visual interfaces. ... Basic configuration used into the LP computer program are presented together in which PARC developed laser printers, the ethernet, internets, networked personal computers, the client-server model, bitmap displays, icons and graphical user interfaces, the desktop metaphor and overlapping windows, and various other foundations of the computing world as we know it. This is one of those classic reads of Computing history, mentioned and commented in other works as "the only definitive coverage of the history of Xerox Parc", which it is, but somehow its not perfect.
