The things you surround yourself with become an extension of yourself as a man. Here are 50 things every man should own. How many can you tick off? Yes, I know it's totally awesome but does it really speak to your personality? Find a decor or style of art that does, and slowly introduce relevant pieces into your living space. Better yet, have a piece "commissioned" on the cheap from an artistic friend. What are the things every man should know? From building fires to tying your tie, if you're a man, the things on this list are essentials for being the best, most manly man you can be. But it's not all beer and sports. Men should also know how to hold a baby and sew on a button. Do you know which fork to use at a fancy dinner? There are things everyone should know, but this list is full of advice for men, with tips, tricks, and basic information all male humans should know. So get in touch with your inner Ron Swanson and read through the list below to make sure you know how to escape zip ties and shine your shoes. You just never know when this advice will come in handy. Have you ever thought to yourself, "Hey, I'm a guy. Aren't there specific things I should know?" Now, we're not suggesting that every man should be able to build a house from the ground up, but some general practices are definitely worth stashing away in your bank of skills. For example, knowing how to saw wood and use power tools, soundly nail or screw furniture together, and build something "even as basic as a single shelf" can come in handy if you ever want to be creative or helpful around the house. Just remember, knowing first aid also means knowing your limits. If you're not a doctor, you probably shouldn't try to set a broken bone. There are few things as frustrating as going out to the bar with some friends only to find out that they don't actually know how to play billiards or score a game of darts. Bar games give you something to focus on other than just drinking. Sexy Men. Hot Guys Beautiful Men. Beautiful People.
