Soon they soared above the streets, canals, bridges, and clay-brick buildings of Bagdad. In courtyard and bazaar, people bought and sold, worked and rested, fought and prayed, stole and chased, kissed and parted, laughed and wept. "Truly," said the Calif, "a stork knows more of this city than the Calif himself." As evening drew near, the Vizier called, "Glorious Lord, we had best return to the palace." Back they flew to the lake, and landed by the snuffbox. The Enchanted Storks book. Read 2 reviews from the world's largest community for readers. Caliph Charid, of Bagdad, was reclining on his divan one pleasant afternoon, smoking his long pipe and sipping coffee from a handsome dish which a slave was holding for him, when his Grand Vizier, Mansor entered and told him of a peddler in the court below whose wares might interest him. The Caliph, being in an affable state of mind, summoned the peddler, who, delighted with the opportunity, displayed all the treasures of his pack. There were pearls, rings, silks, and many other rich things. The two enchanted birds decided to remain there for the night; then wandered through the deserted rooms and corridors, which gave of evidence of former splendor. Choosing the powder, he was changed into a stork, and was kept in the palace gardens.
