

THOR THE WIND-RAISER AND THE EYRARLAND IMAGE

Richard Perkins

The range of the Vikings' expansion is to no small extent due to the exploitation of wind-power. It is wind-power that allowed them to reach Newfoundland in the west and to sail the length of the Caspian in the east.

This book explores the superstitions of the Vikings about wind-raising and the gods believed to control the wind. There is good evidence that Thor was a deity regarded as having special powers in this respect: a passage from an Old Icelandic text tells us how he was thought of as doing this, whilst various objects found in the Viking area represent the god in the process of raising a wind and are to be regarded as 'wind-amulets'. A possible parallel to these from a Lithuanian source is discussed. Special attention is given to the well-known Eyrarland image found in northern Iceland. Detailed arguments confirm that this is indeed an image of Thor. Further, possible models for it are perhaps to be found amongst Egyptian antiquities. Amongst other things, the book incorporates a concise study of the Old Icelandic Rauðúlfs þátrr ok Rauðs.

The author, Richard Perkins, is Professor Emeritus of Norse Studies at University College London.

The Eyrarland Statue is a small seated bronze figure circa 1000 or earlier that was unearthed in 1815 on the Eyrarland farm in Akureyri, Iceland. There is speculation that the statue is a wind-raising amulet for seafarers, depicting the Norse god Thor blowing a mighty wind into his beard. In Thor the Wind-Raiser, Richard Perkins presents what is probably the definitive explanation of the Eyrarland image, one that accepts the figure's traditional identification as a likeness of ÅžÅ³rr, yet is not far from Motz's vision of a wind-instrument player. Perkins begins by reviewing the importance of wind-power in early societies, and the widespread invocation of particular deities to assure favorable winds. This would have had especial relevance for Viking Age Scandinavians, who were distinguished for their seafaring exploits. (The Eyrarland statue in the museum of Iceland). So we could maybe see Thor attempting to kill the Midgard serpent as a symbolic representation of the protection he bestows on seafarers? Is Thor the God of seafaring because he pacifies creatures of the deep? Will someone traveling with the likeness of Thor cast off such creatures and hence have a safer trip? It's kinda hard to know, but if you want to know more about this particular aspect of the Old Norse religion, I advise you to read the absolutely breath-taking book Thor the Wind Raiser and the Eyrarland Image (Richard Perkins). The Eyrarland Statue is a bronze statue of a seated figure (6.7 cm [1][2]) from about AD 1000 that was recovered at the Eyrarland farm in the area of Akureyri, Iceland. The object is a featured item at the National Museum of Iceland. The statue may depict the Norse god Thor and/or may be a gaming-piece. The statue was unearthed in 1815 or 1816 on one of two farms called Eyrarland in the vicinity of Akureyri. [2][3][4]. If the object is correctly identified as Thor, Thor is here holding his hammer Mjöllnir, sculpted in the typically Icelandic cross-like shape. Thor the wind-raiser and the Eyrarland image.
